The boss of a Tesla factory defended the decision to send managers to the homes of workers site betsbola medical license.

In the last few weeks, a director of the Tesla electric car factory in Germany sent managers to check on about two dozen employees who continued to be paid while they were site betsbola medical license in the last nine months.

André Thierig, director of production at the factory, said that home visits were common practices in industry and the company simply wanted "to appeal to the ethics of work of employees".

The change in the factory's head office in the USA by Elon Musk provoked indignation with the IG Metall union, which represents a proportion of the 12,000 workers at the Berlin-Brandenburg gigafactory.

The union has been campaigning against what it says are tough working conditions with long hours "unfairly" and a poor site betsbola health.

"Employees in almost all areas of the factory reported a very high workload", said Dirk Schulze, regional director of the union. "When there is a shortage of workers and the sick are pressured by those who remain healthy they are overburdened with extra work".

"If the supervisors at the factory really want to reduce the level of illness, they must break this vicious circle."

Medical license fees at the factory in the surrounding area, which the union says operate with a "culture of fear", usually reach 15% or more.

The union said there is a "culture of fear" and it has caused stress among workers.

Nevertheless, Thierig said that some workers were taking advantage of German labor laws.

He said that among the 1,500 temporary workers at the factory, site betsbola conditions similar to those of full-time employees the average absence rate due to illness is only 2%.

"In our analyses of attendance at work, some phenomena became obvious: on Friday and night shift about 5% more employees take medical leave than on other days of the week", said Thierig. "This is not an indicator of bad conditions because the circumstances are the same site betsbola all hours of the week or during the entire period; it also suggests the exploitation of the German social system up to a point."
